It is desirable, in some configurations, for a semiconductor circuit to have a low capacitance between conductive portions. This may be achieved by reducing the cross sectional area of a conductive portion of the semiconductor circuit, but doing so reduces the current carrying capacity of the conductive portion. For semiconductor circuits used in high speed applications, having low capacitance between conductive portions may be particularly challenging. Another consideration for a semiconductor circuit is that the manufacturing process for the semiconductor circuit may result in a relatively large capacitance between conductive portions of the semiconductor circuit. This may be problematic for semiconductor circuits used in high speed applications in which an undesirably large capacitance between conductive portions of the semiconductor circuit may reduce the operating speed of the semiconductor circuit. Another consideration for a semiconductor circuit is that it may be desirable for the semiconductor circuit to have relatively low impedance in at least one portion of the circuit (e.g., a portion of the circuit having high frequency performance). Yet another consideration is that it may be desirable for the semiconductor circuit to be physically compact.
